Cartier-bresson did not plan or arrange his photographs. his practice was to release the shutter at the moment his instincts told him the scene before him was in perfect balance. this he later famously titled "the decisive moment" — a concept that would influence photographers throughout the twentieth century. Cartier-bresson has compared his activity in painting, photography and the moving pictures to the gear shift of an automobile, for the fields are mutually separated yet closely interrelated. work in each medium strengthens the others by stimulating and training visual observation.
